It shows us that a failure to transmit awareness of women's achievements and disappointments across the generations impoverishes current conversations, particularly those around the gender pay gap. A thousand years after they brewed ale, traded in cloth, and laboured on building sites, medieval women's work still matters. References:

In the same way that gender history in general grew out of women's history, the study of gender and work developed primarily out of studies on women's work. Economic and labor historians whose primary focus was work were often more attentive to class differences than to those of gender; their focus was the male work experience, but its gendered ...
